Abstract: Several passages of Horace are explained.

Key words: Horace, textual criticism.

Resumen: Se explican diversos pasajes de Horacio.

Palabras clave: Horacio, crítica textual.

4, 1, 4-8:

desine dulcium
mater saeva Cupidinum,
circa lustra decem flectere mollibus
iam durum imperis: abi, quo blandae iuvenum te revocant preces.

The poet states that he is no longer interested in love. According to Page¹, Horace refers here to his age, and lustrum is put “for a space of five years.” I would like to suggest, however, that lustra², in line 6, means meretriciae domus. We should translate as follows:

“O cruel mother of sweet Cupids, strive no more in the region of ten (i.e. numerous: cf. OLD s.v. decem 1, b, b) brothels (circa³ lustra decem) to bend one now callous to your soft commands.”

For lustrum meaning “brothel” cf. Odes 2, 4, 22 ff.:

fuge suspicari,
cuius octavum trepidavit aetas
claudere lustrum.

Translate as follows:

“Suspect not one⁴ whose youth (aetās) hastened to cause eight domus meretriciae to be shut.”⁵

The poet managed to visit no fewer than eight meretriciae domus. Similar numerical boasts are found in the Greek Anthology: cf. Veleia 15, 1998, page 395 f.

² Cf. Lewis-Short, A Latin Dictionary, s.v. lustrum II, B: “A house of ill-repute.”
³ Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. circa II, A, 3: “in the region of, near to.”
⁴ Scil. of being a pathicus.
⁵ The verb claudere, which has puzzled scholars, is now clear: it is used in the causative sense by the poet. When a client occupied a domus meretricia, the door was closed. For the employment of verbs in a causative sense in Latin cf. Veleia 23, 2006, page 271 (note 24).
4, 2, 46-50:

“O sol
pulcher, o laudande!” canam recepto Caesare felix.
tuque dum procedis, io Triumphe!
non semel dicemus, “io Triumphe!”

line 49 tu v.l. procedis : procedit v.l. (cf. Klingner’s apparatus)

Scholars⁶ have been puzzled by the meaning of line 49. Perfect sense can, however, be restored to the transmitted text if we print the reading procedit, and translate as follows:

“O glorious day, with honour to be mentioned. I shall sing (canam) happy (felix) when Caesar has returned, and you too (tuque) will sing while he proceeds (dum procedit).”

4, 4, 13-16:

quamemve laetis caprea pascuis
intenta fulvae matris ab ubere iam lacte depulsum leonem
dente novo peritura vidit.

For the difficulties presented by this passage cf. Page and Wickham ad loc. Here, ab ubere lacte means “from the plentiful milk (of his tawny mother)”: cf. OLD s.v. uber 2 and Lewis-Short, s.v. uber, quoting ubere campo.

4, 4, 17-24:

videre Raetis bella sub Alpibus Drusum gerentem Vindelici ; (quibus mos unde deductus per omne
tempus Amazonia securi
dextrae obarbet, quaerere distuli, nec scire fas est omnia) sed diu
lategue victrices catervae
consiliiis iuvenis revictae

Scholars⁷ have been puzzled by the meaning of line 22. Perfect sense can, however, be made of the transmitted text if we place a full stop after est, and translate as follows: “nor is it permitted to know. But the hordes long victorious in all ways (omnia⁸) far and wide were vanquished by the young man’s wisdom.”

⁶ Cf. Page and Wickham ad loc.
⁷ Cf. Page ad loc.

4, 4, 29-32:

fortes creantur fortibus et bonis;
est in iuvencis, est in equis patrum 30
virtus, neque imbellem feroce progenerant aquilae columbam.

Horace states here that brave men are created due to brave men. I would like to suggest that we should place a full stop after fortibus, and translate as follows:

“Brave men are created from brave men. And the merits of their fathers appear in noble youths (bonis … in iuvenci”) and in horses.”

In other words, both men and animals inherit the noble qualities of their fathers.

4, 4, 37-44:

quid debeas, o Roma, Neronibus,
testis Metaurum flumen et Hasdrubal
devictus et pulcher fugatis
ille dies Latio tenebris, 40
qui primus alma risit adorea, dirus per urbes Afer ut Italas
cen flamma per taedas vel Eurus per Siculas equitavit undas.

line 41 alma : arma v.l.

Horace refers here to the Carthaginians. Keller-Holder, Klingner, Page and Wickham prefer the variant alma in line 41 (= “cheering” Page): alma and adorea are of course taken to be ablatives. However, the variant arma (cf. Keller-Holder’s apparatus) would seem to indicate that Horace (cf. Page, page xxvii footnote) has exceptionally not lengthened the fifth syllable, following his Greek model. In this case, the sense would be: “the day which first derided arms (in this case the arms of the Carthaginians), since the time when the Carthaginians invaded Italy with glory (adorea).” This interpretation fits with the meaning of ut, which means here “since when”: cf. Page ad loc. The contrast is between the glory obtained by the Carthaginians until the first day

⁸ Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. omnia: “adverbially altogether, entirely.”

⁹ Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. iuvencus II, 2: “Sc. homo, a young man.”

Sed occupies the second position, after omnia (cf. OLD, s.v. sed: “not infrequently postponed in poetry”).

For the debated punctuation of this passage cf. Wickham ad loc.
when the Romans could laugh at them because they were defeated. Note the enjambement of adorea with the following line. Moreover, the epithet alma with adorea would be otiose. I need hardly add that Horace’s versification offers many examples of metrical rarities. It seems to me that, if my reasoning is correct, the reading arma, attested in very many manuscripts, is not a corruption, but the lectio difficilior.

The prosodic parallel between 4. 4. 41 armā and 3. 5. 17 perirēt is perfect.

4, 4, 65-68:

```
merses profundo, pulchrior evenit;
luctere, multa proruet integrum
cum laude victrem geretque proelia coniugibus loquenda.

line 66 luctere: ductore v.l.

Horace mentions here the Roman race: cf. line 53 gens. I would like to point out that the variant reading ductore makes better sense. We should translate as follows: “Drown it in the depths. It comes forth nobler due to its leader (ductore).”

Horace explains that the Roman race, led by its military leader (cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. ductor), will conquer its enemies with great renown. Note the asnydeton between ductore and multa. Luctere was introduced in order to establish parallelism with merses, but is contextually inapposite.

Horace is talking of the Roman gens when already defeated (merses profundo), so that the subsequent mention of a struggle would be contextually incongruous. Note the perfect parallel with lines 23f. victrices catervae consiliis iuvenis revictae.10

4, 4, 73-76:

nil Claudiae non perficient manus,
quas et benigno numine Iuppiter
defendit et curae sagaces
expediunt per acuta belli.

Scholars11 have been puzzled by the meaning of line 76. I would like to suggest that *peracuta*12 is an adverb. We should translate as follows:

“which counsels experienced in war (*sagaces*13 … belli) prepare (expediunt) very keenly (peracuta).”

10 Note the enjambement between evenit and ductore.
11 Cf. Page ad loc.
12 For the adverb peracuta cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. acutae: “canis ululat, Enn.” and Forcellini, s.v. acuo, II B 3 “adverbiorum more”. For peracuta = “very keenly” cf. e.g. perfacile = “very easily.”
13 Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. sagax II: “With gen.”
4, 5, 9-14:

ut mater iuvenem, quem Notus invido
flatu Carpathii trans maris aequora cunctantem spatio longius annuo
dulci distinet a domo,
votis ominibusque et precibus vocat,
curvo nec faciem litore demovet.

line 14 demovet : dimovet v.l.

Horace describes a mother who awaits her son. I would like to point out that the variant reading dimovet makes good sense. We should translate as follows:

“she invokes him with vows, with omens and with prayers, and she does not thrust aside (dimovet) his appearance (faciem) from the curving shore.”

In other words, the mother is keen to see her son again, and does not thrust aside his memory, of which she is dreaming.

For facies “as seen in dreams and visions” cf. OLD s.v. 5. The mother cannot be said to “avert her face from the shore”, because she, insofar as expecting her son sailing back from the high sea, would look at the horizon, just as Theseus’ father did, not at the shore.

4, 5, 21-24:

nullis polluitur casta domus stupris
mos et lex maculosum edomuit nefas, laudantur simili prole puerperae, culpam poena premit comes.

Page explained that Horace is referring here to the “lex Julia de adulteriis which had been passed B.C. 17.” I would like to suggest that we should place a full stop after domus, and translate as follows:

“the chaste home is polluted by nobody (nullis14). Custom and law have stamped out sin tainted by lewdness (stupris).”

4, 6, 25-26:

doctor argutae fidicen Thaliae,
Phoebe, qui Xantho lavis amne crinis,

14 Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. nullus B: “Subst.: nullus, ius, m., for nemo, no one, nobody.”

For the plural nulli cf. OLD s.v. nullus, 2.

Nefas is left unexplained if we take stupris to agree with nullis.

Maculosum governs the ablative stupris: cf. OLD s.v. maculosus, 3. Note the elegant enjambment between stupris and maculosum – a feature exceedingly frequent in Horace’s style.
Apollo is said to be the lyric (fidicen) teacher of melodious Thalia (argutae ... Thaliae). The Muse Thalia\textsuperscript{15} was loved by Apollo, and became the mother of the Corybantes.

4, 6, 37-40:

\begin{quote}
rite Latonae puerum canentes,
rite crescentem face Noctilucam, prosperam frugum celeremque pronos
volvere menses.
\end{quote}

Scholars\textsuperscript{16} have been puzzled by the meaning of lines 38 ff. Perfect sense can, however, be restored to this passage if we translate as follows:

“duly singing Latona’s son and the favourable Moon waxing (crescentem) duly with light (face), and swift to speed the easy (pronois) months (menses) of the fruits of the earth (frugum).”

4, 10, 1-2:

\begin{quote}
O crudelis adhuc et Veneris muneribus potens
insperata tuae cum veniet pluma superbiae
\end{quote}

Scholars\textsuperscript{17} have been puzzled by the meaning of lines 1-2. Perfect sense can be restored to the transmitted text if we place a comma after muneribus, and translate as follows:

“You who are indeed still cruel due to the gifts of Venus, when unexpected down (pluma) arrives, which has power over (potens\textsuperscript{18}) your pride (tuae ... superbiae) …”

Horace means that the arrogant boy will be punished when hairs\textsuperscript{19} spoil his youthful beauty.

4, 12, 5-8:

\begin{quote}
nidum ponit, Ityn flebiliter gemens, inflexis avis et Cecropiae domus
aeternum opprobrium, quod male barbaras regum est ulta libidines.
\end{quote}

line 5 Ityn : Itys v.l., cf. Keller-Holder and Borzsak’s apparatus Critics are puzzled as to why Thalia should be mentioned here (cf. Villeneuve \textit{ad loc.}). They failed to note, however, that Thalia was beloved by Apollo.

\textsuperscript{16} Cf. Page and Wickham \textit{ad loc.}, who both take prosperam to govern the genitive frugum – a construction not elsewhere attested. But here menses governs the genitive frugum (cf. Thes. s.v. mensis 748, 11 f.: mense novarum frugum), the sense being “the months of the fruits of the earth”. Que is in the second position (= frugumque celerem).

\textsuperscript{17} Cf. Wickham, new edition, \textit{ad loc.}

\textsuperscript{18} Cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. potens B, 1 : “Having power over ... with gen.”

\textsuperscript{19} For the fact that the beauty of a pathicus is soon spoilt by the hairs which grow with adolescence cf. my \textit{New Studies In Greek Poetry} (Amsterdam 1989), page 73.

Note the enjambement between potens and insperata.
Horace refers here to Spring. Scholars, who accept the reading \textit{Ityn}, are at a loss to decide whether the bird who is crying (\textit{gemens}) is a swallow or a nightingale (cf. Wickham and Page \textit{ad loc.}). I would like to suggest that the correct reading in this passage is \textit{Itys}. Horace is referring to the fact that \textit{Itys} was turned into a pheasant. Translate as follows:

"Making tearful lament, \textit{Itys}\textsuperscript{20} makes a nest, an ill-fated bird, the everlasting disgrace of the Cecropian house, since it avenged too cruelly the barbarous lust of kings."

Horace, in overtly alluding to the well-known Tereus legend (Roscher, s.v. \textit{Itys}, 572 ), wants to emphasize that not three of the protagonists of the legend (Procne, Philomela and Tereus) were changed into birds, but all four of them, i.e. including \textit{Itys}.

The reading \textit{Ityn} came into being because the fact that \textit{Itys} was changed into a pheasant was not well known (only one mythographer mentions it): a reader, not knowing this, changed \textit{Itys} into \textit{Ityn}, and took \textit{gemens} to be transitive, thereby banalizing the text and bringing it into line with the numerous passages where Procne or Philomela bewailed \textit{Itys}.

Pheasants make their nests in spring, and the males have a very loud voice.

If the reading \textit{Itys} were a \textit{lapsus calami}, we would have to conclude that it is by accident proved absolutely correct by the legend to which Horace alludes, which hypothesis would be hardly tenable.

\textbf{Heather White}

\textsuperscript{20} For the fact that \textit{Itys} was turned into a pheasant cf. Lewis-Short, s.v. \textit{Itys}. Cf. also Lewis-Short, s.v. \textit{Phasis}, \textit{idis} ... poet. Colchian: \textit{volucre}, i.e. pheasants, Mart. 13, 45, 1. \textit{Itys} died lamenting his fate: cf. Ovid, \textit{Met.} 6, 640 \textit{clamantem}.
